

Group Reflection – Michael Souprounovich

In my experience working with “That Team”, it was particularly good. Everyone in the team was very helpful, sociable and did their part. There weren’t any disagreements, fights etc. One bad thing about our team was that one or two people didn’t work at all – they didn’t even show up in our group discussion. I was surprised at how well we worked together; I have always had a bad experience with teamwork. I was also surprised that working in groups online is as good as face-to-face teamwork, as I have never worked in a group that only met online. I learnt that groups aren’t always a disaster zone, and that there are a multitude of very useful tools online that make group collaboration a piece of cake. We used Microsoft Teams as our communication platform. We were supposed to contribute to the website individually, our team did things a bit differently and we chose one person in our group to maintain the website, and everyone else just did all the writing and the website maintainer just took it and formatted it for the website. This was effective and we used Wordpress to ensure that the construction of our website was quick and simple.
